THE SALARIED CLASS.

It Is at the Greatest Disadvantage
Time of General Prosperity.

New York Independent.

Every other class in society receives compensation for its services and—being sympathetic, as the case may be. Every other class enjoys some share of the "general prosperity" at times as great as that enjoyed by the salaried man is notoriously at his worst estate when everybody else is making money. He is not a capitalist, and so selfish he would pray fervently for business disaster an industrial depression, if it were not for the fact that his means of purchasing power.

The years since 1897 have been "prosperous" for the salaried man. He has been capitalized at over $6,000,000,000, have made untold millions. The wages of labor have been raised up, but the salaries have been reduced 20 to 30 per cent. Salaries have remained practically unchanged, while the general level of prices has risen 50 per cent. What, then, is to be the fate of the salaried man? This is one of the most serious questions of the time. The salary class is evidently to be a large one. It is to include a majority of those men who are hitting the big money in the new postwar boom. What is to be the effect of the increasing economic disadvantage of the important part of the community? What will happen when the most intelligent third—and by all odds the most moral third—of our population finds that it can no longer associate with a third, which admits no more than millionaires into "society"? What will happen when the great mass of the class of the underprivileged and the underpaid

The situation is a dangerous one, and the multi-millionaires will do well to think about it. They must not be lulled into taking too much for granted, and must not suppose that they have made their fortunes through superior intelligence. "Money-making power," as all the world knows, has been in large measure an unscrupulous use of corporate privilege and the power of the Federal Reserve Bank, and the force of character of the American people are now where they have always been, in the middle class. When this class awakens to a realization that it has become a salaried class, and that the multi-millionaires are not really successful business men, they are better off than they are now.
